

The number zero was not something in every culture. In Babylonian numbers, they didn't have a symbol for zero but in Mayan numbers, there was a symbol for zero. Also when counting in binary there is a zero. I think the number zero is very important since it represents nothing. For example, the Babylonians didn't know or it was hard to understand the place value of the number because there was no symbol for nothing. If they did, it would be easier to fully understand what number they meant every time.

I made this into an ad because I think it ties in well with my major. I am a Political Science major and I hope to become a campaign manager. Common tasks campaign managers do is marketing and social media. This would include making the politician look their best so they can get votes. They also tend to work in a team and plan what the politician will do, as in parades, meeting, etc., so citizens can listen to their values and see if they are interested in voting for them, when that time comes.
